9.2 METRO

Metro is the fastest and the most efficient way to travel across the city. There are now 16 lines in Shanghai and covers nearly the entire city. The train interval is 3-15 minutes depending on the line. Lines that run around Central Shanghai runs on 2-5 minutes interval.

The minimum fare for each train ride is 3 RMB. Tickets cost around 3-10 RMB based on the distance you travel. You can either buy a single journey ticket at the automated machines or use the transportation card we offer. The transportation cards are valid for the Metro, buses and taxis.

Signs and maps are clear and in English, making the metro system easy to navigate. However, try to avoid taking transportation during rush hours of 7:30-10:00am and 5:00-7:30pm in weekdays.

9.3 TAXI

Taxi is the fastest means of transportation, traffic permitting. Finding a taxi on the busy streets of the city is easy in most cases. However, during the rush hours finding one could be difficult, in which case you may want to take the metro.

Although most of the drivers are familiar with the city, being as specific as possible with directions will speed up your journey and make it cheaper. Normally, quoting the street name of the intersecting street would be preferred. Tipping is not expected. Cash and transportation card are the only means for payment.

13. BANKING

13.1. Foreign Currency Exchange

Bank cards issued by many international financial institutions can be used at ATMs in China. The most widely acceptable ones are VISA and MasterCard. Some others, such as American Express, Diners, Discovery, and JCB are also acceptable to a smaller number of ATMs. Therefore, we suggest you take VISA or MasterCard to China.

However, the majority of cards issued by foreign banks cannot be used to withdraw cash over the counter at Chinese banks. If you need a large amount of cash, you have to go to the head office of the Bank of China downtown.

You can exchange a certain amount of RMB as the first few days of daily expenses when arriving at the airport. Carrying a large amount of RMB poses a hidden risk to your safety and lots of bank outlets in Shanghai offer foreign currency exchange service.

14. SIM Card Purchase in Mainland China

Having a local mobile phone number in China can prove very convenient. To communicate with your Chinese friends or any other friend in China is actually very simple when you have a local SIM card. If you are stuck in traffic you can call and tell someone you are late. If you have a taxi driver who doesn't understand you, you can put him on the phone with a Chinese friend, a teacher or the school administration office. People can also reach you from overseas and in a pinch you can use the phone to ring overseas (long distance calling cards are the cheap way to call overseas) depending on your needs and the company you use, you will have many choices to get a local SIM card. This article presents the different SIM cards you can use during your stay in our school, and in China.

14.1. China Mobile

There are many companies in China, but we highly recommend you use China Mobile which is the largest carrier with the widest network coverage.

14.2. China mobile call rates

The charge of your call varies, based on the different SIM cards and the region you call from. Basically, the local call is about 0.2 RMB per minute.

Although the call fees are quite similar, each different package provides its own services. The package is determined at the time you purchase your SIM card.

14.3. Call overseas from China

When you get your local SIM card, you need to subscribe first from your network provider before you can call back home directly from your new SIM card. But this way turns to be very expensive. The cheapest way to call back home is to use an IP card and a landline. You can also use your IP card on your mobile with any local SIM card. An IP card costs about 20 to 25 RMB according to the shortage in the place you buy it, and every IP card has a credit of RMB100. Currently, the IP phone service has covered the whole country, providing international service between China and over 200 countries and regions. There will be instructions on each IP card to tell you how to make a call. You can also use IC card to make long distance calls. It works almost like IP cards but the rate for calls are usually much higher.
